County officials report seventh COVID-19 case

BY COLLIN OVERTON

Although the seven confirmed cases of COVID-19 in Jefferson County pose a low risk to the public, residents should still be careful and follow all social distancing and hygiene guidelines from the state and local health officials, local officials aid at their fourth briefing on the pandemic Tuesday.

It was the group's first meeting over the web conferencing app Zoom, which they started using to better adhere to social distancing policies, with the briefing streamed live to the county's Facebook page. Jefferson County had seven confirmed cases of the coronavirus at the time of the briefing, with the entire state reporting 28,764 tests, 5,507 positives and 173 deaths.

Ripley, Jennings and Clark Counties have the highest COVID rates among bordering counties, with 76, 41 and 82 cases, respectively.

"I can say that we've been very, very, very fortunate in that thus far, all of our cases are fairly self-contained," Blythe Couch, Jefferson County Public Health Coordinator said. "A number of them were either already quarantining before they found out during their infectious periods. A few of them are not employed anywhere, so that's good. Some of them had pre-existing conditions that, there again, put them in that category where they were already self-quarantining just for good measure because they were trying to keep from getting it. Our contract tracings thus far have been very, very limited, and that's why we initially said in one of the first press releases that we believe the risk to the public was low. That was the case then, and thankfully that is still the case now."

County Health Officer Dr. John Hossler supported that assessment, saying King's Daughters' Health's policy from the get-go was "if you have symptoms, assume you have it." He reminded viewers to self-isolate for at least a week if they show symptoms and then only come out of

Madison declares public health emergency

City seeks support during COVID-19 crisis

BY MARK CAMPBELL

Mayor Bob Courtney Tuesday issued an executive order declaring the City of Madison in a COVID-19 coronavirus public health emergency.

The action mirrors recent action by the state and many other cities and counties and positions the city to be able to apply for federal, state and local disaster relief funding to help cover costs related to responding to the pandemic.

City Attorney Joe Jenner said the city expects the federal government and state of Indiana to provide assistance to the city, but there have been conflicting accounts on what support will be extended and the declaration could assist the city in recovering as much help as possible.

"We've already taken lots of action with regard to aide to our community and programs and this is one that will allow us to recover any cost we incur," said Courtney.

CHARLIE'S BEAT

Catching up with Brickley

BY CHARLIE ROHLFING

We did a story on Tim Brickley back in September of 2019, but I thought it would be interesting to catch up with him in the midst of this whole virus shutdown. For those of you who don't know Tim, he lives in Indy but actually plays down here in Madison very frequently.

Tim is a regular at Off Broadway Taproom, he's played Thomas Family Winery many times, and he was the Dr. John character in the recent Last Waltz concerts at The Bike. His first foray to Madison was actually a special theatrical music production called "Pure Prine" about 10 years ago.

Redevelopment Commission Zooms through business

Resolutions clear way for next move in Madison Plaza project

BY MARK CAMPBELL

It took a few extra minutes for the Madison Redevelopment Commission to set up Tuesday's Zoom teleconference meeting, but once everybody was online the group quickly moved through the business of paying outstanding claims and adopting resolutions needed in ongoing negotiations to redevelopment the former Madison Plaza shopping center site on the hilltop.

In order to comply with Gov. Eric Holcomb's order on social distancing and crowd sizes, the Commission met using teleconferencing software with the session also broadcast to the public on the city's Facebook page before fielding questions from the media afterwards.

The Commission adopted Resolution 3-2020 confirming a Plan Amendment and Resolution 4-2020 approving several items related to Madison Plaza site from approval of property appraisals, to a conditional purchase agreement and a notice for disposition of property.

According the Matt Wirth, the city's executive director for economic development, the resolutions were the final action in a series of board approvals clearing the way for the city to purchase the 22-acre Madison Plaza site. He said the next step will be the disposition of that property once the city finds the right economic developers or partners moving forward.

And while a lot of businesses and industries have been ground to a halt by the current COVID-19 health crisis, that hasn't seemed to slow the city's work to land investors and/or developers to reuse the long dormant site at the southeast intersection of Michigan Road and Clifty Drive.

Wirth said while the COVID-19 crisis has been a disruption for local businesses and industry, it's not had significant impact on potential investors for the Madison Plaza site.

"Negotiations have continued throughout," Wirth said, noting investors are "still interested in Madison" and the city is talking to potential developers and doing its due diligence.

The city's plan is to develop the western part of the tract for commercial and business and the eastern wooded area for multi-family housing. The city has agreed to buy the land for $2.75 million and Mayor Bob Courtney thinks the city can see up to $40 million in investment on the site depending on what partners sign on.

Courtney said the COVID-19 public health emergency has actually given the city an opportunity to evaluate the economics.

"We've been straddling the fence. You have to take the disruption in the market into account," said Courtney, noting most retailers are facing tough challenges. "I don't think it's a negative, but we've just got to evaluate all the facts we have and make the best return on our investment."

He said the bigger issue is the disruption in the overall economy and how long that will continue before business and industry bounce back.

"How long it will take remains to be seen," the Mayor said, adding he still sees the project moving forward. "We've still got quite a bit of work to do."

Courtney hopes to have those negotiations resolved by Aug. 31.

Meanwhile, the mayor said the current health crisis has been rough on everybody — especially small businesses and services — but the sacrifices are necessary for the health and safety of the public.

Several Redevelopment Commission members voice their support for the job the city and county are doing to deal with the crisis — especially the city's program to help small businesses and a plan to provide work to displaced employees.

Courtney said the city has received about 150 job applications so far and hired 40-50 workers who have been "great assets to our workforce" and providing "urgent essential needs helping our community."

He added that the city has hired community outreach employees to help residents get groceries and police officers are helping deliver medicine so the city's most vulnerable residents can stay in their homes and isolate from virus exposure.

The city will begin enrolling volunteers to provide even more assistance to residents going forward while also working to raise donations for a small business rescue program to help some of the hardest hit local businesses survive the coronavirus emergency.

In other business, the Commission approved $246,058 in disbursements including $150,000 to the city's PACE Fund, $35,529 to Sedam Contracting or for a project on Industrial Drive and another $43,467 for a Sedam project at the Riverside Tower development. Other disbursements included $8,772 to Barnes & Thornburg, $5,159 to Jacobi, Toombs & Lanz and $3,130 to QK4.

Like so many people who visit and fall in love with our little town, Tim wouldn't mind having a place here. "I just want a little carriage house, or some kind of simple loft space," said Tim. "I don't need much, just a fun place to crash when I have gigs down here. If anybody knows of anything that would fit a musician's budget, let me know."

Like so many full time musicians, the shutdown has hit Tim pretty hard. "I've gone to zero income almost overnight," Tim said. "I also have a music studio business called Hit City Recording. It's right around the corner from the Jazz Kitchen on College Avenue. But of course, nobody's recording now either.

"On the plus side, I have time to do a lot of things I've always wanted to try, and to catch up on some of the projects I've had on the back burner for awhile. I'm actually going to put in a vegetable garden for the first time in my life. I'm an old city kid, and I've never been around gardens or planting of any kind. I'm excited to try it.

"I've also been able to finish up a very cool project that's been in the works for some time," Tim said. "It's a live late night music television show, modeled on the old shows like Playboy After Dark. Those old shows were very hip and super laid back. That's the vibe I'm going for.

"The show is called Different Beat Television, and the concept is that it would air at like 11:30 or midnight on a Friday night and feature a bunch of the great original bands we have around Indianapolis. Actually, I'd prefer to do it totally live, not prerecorded, so it can keep that element of spontaneity and fun.

"We've shot eight bands so far, enough for two complete shows," Tim said. "We did it in my studio space, which is quite small and intimate, and we had four cameramen roving around all at once, getting different angles. I did all the graphics and final editing, so it's very much a labor of love."

"Just about everything these days is on demand and streaming. I'd like this to be more old school, where everybody has to tune in at the same time and watch together. I envision some kid in Greencastle or somewhere staying up late and watching the show, and then getting inspired to join a band or learn guitar."

If you'd like to see a trailer for the show go on Vimeo.com and search "Different Beat Cyrus Youngman." Tim's put together a little six-minute preview of the show.

"I actually just had a conversation with WISH TV up here in Indy about the show, so you never know," Tim said. "When this shutdown is over maybe we'll start production of a whole series."

CRISIS

In a meeting that moved quickly with all city and elected officials participating by Zoom teleconferencing, the city also took action to adopt a resolution creating a new public safety fund for money collected in a new county income tax for public safety purposes.

The county adopted the tax to help pay for a new county jail but Madison was not bound by that decision and could spend the receipts on its own public safety needs.

Later in the meeting, Courtney explained that the city and county have been negotiating a new comprehensive interlocal agreement on a number of issues and that part of that understanding is for the city to send a portion of its part of the public safety tax to the county for the new jail project while the county will reciprocate to the city by renewing support of the 2-mile buffer zone and investing some of its funds in the city's PACE revitalization project to attract business and industry and target revitalization of blighted neighborhoods by earmarking public grant money to match private investment dollars.

He said the city wants to increase the PACE program from $50,000 to $100,000 annually to about $500,000 to spur bigger change faster and be able to target entire neighborhoods for revitalization. That would require a "substantial" amount of county money in addition to what the city already allocates, Courtney said.

Part of the agreement will be to add a sixth member to the city's PACE Grant Review Committee to represent Jefferson County while also partnering on a drug treatment facility at the county jail as well as historic preservation and economic development projects. The amendment also streamlines some of the procedures involved in applying for grants and applications or renovation and demolition projects in the historic district putting more decision making on the city's staff as opposed to the Historic District Board of Review (HDBR).

Proposed changes to the city's application process and the oversight role of the HDBR have drawn discussion at other meetings and written public comments from 12 residents — some supporting the measure and some opposing — were entered in the meeting minutes Tuesday. Those people would normally have been able to comment on the proposal at a meeting but with meetings being held by teleconference during the coronavirus emergency, that was not possible.

A motion was made to suspend the rules and allow a third reading and adoption of the ordinance amendment Tuesday, but the measure died on a 6-1 vote with Councilperson Dan Dattilo opposing. The vote had to be unanimous to suspend the rules.

Dattilo said he supports the amendment but with so many residents weighing in on the issue by written comment, he wanted more time for discussion and consideration before voting.

"I don't think it's a bad thing. I just hope the public has had an opportunity to review these documents," Dattilo said.

In other business, the council:

- Heard the first reading of an ordinance to repeal and replace the city's Economic Development Revolving Loan Fund Program to where those dollars will now be controlled by the city rather than a partnership with the county and the Jefferson County Industrial Development Corporation.
- Approved amendments to the city's park department hours and fees schedule related to facilities use.
- Heard a report by Courtney that the city is still negotiating a road transfer agreement with the Indiana Department of transportation for city takeover of S.R. 56 through downtown Madison. Both have met and discussed needed improvements and the mayor thinks the state will make some upgrades before July.

isolation if without a fever for at least 72 hours without medications. He noted that the COVID-19 tests aren't 100% accurate and had about a 50-60% efficacy rate, so people should continue to self-isolate.

"I know it's an extreme inconvenience for everybody, but you've got to understand the job of the health department is to try to protect the health of our community, and that's our ultimate goal, even if it does inconvenience more people," Hossler said.

Hossler said the response time on tests was continuing to lag, but some tests are coming back several days sooner and prioritized differently at the state level. A task force at KDH had taken data from 11 surrounding counties and found 150 tests had been done, with Jefferson County conducting about 75 of those tests, Hossler said.

Hossler answered a couple of questions from viewers of past briefings, asking about representation on the school level and why KDH was only opening it's isolation clinic for testing five days a week. He said a few school officials from the larger districts had been invited to Friday's Zoom meeting and that the clinic was designed to keep the infected population separate from the rest.

"I've worked two Wednesdays; I've had a positive case each time," Hossler said. "We'd much rather do it in that setting where we're fully gowned — eye shields, face masks, N95s — and keep them there so we can deal with them there and not expose them to the rest of the population."

KDH was previously hosting a Saturday clinic, but dropped it due to low demand, Hossler said. He said Saturday's could be restored if the demand is there, and patients can still go to the ER all hours of the day, he said.

Shane Williams, EMS director and emergency preparedness director for KDH, said the number of people tested there was at 173 and the hospital was constantly reviewing plans for a potential but hopefully unlikely massive surge.

Beyond its 86-bed capacity, KDH does have other space available for use in the event of a surge, so outside tents and other methods seen in places where COVID is worse likely won't be necessary, Williams said. All KDH staff members are wearing masks per CDC guidelines, some of which are homemade masks to conserve resources in lower-risk areas of the hospital. Williams said KDH continues to receive more test kits from the state and is testing patients who meet State Department of Health criteria for symptoms.

He reiterated that the isolation clinic could be flexible with hours if needed and reminded anyone wanting to get tested there to first call the KDH COVID hotline at 812-801-8010.

On the city front, Madison Mayor Bob Courtney said the city closed all public basketball courts last weekend and placed signage on all parks, shelter houses and golf course about proper distancing and usage. The basketball courts have posed a problem to social distancing rules in recent weeks as residents, especially youth with more time on their hands, have congregated in groups larger than 10 people.

Courtney also thanked local healthcare workers on the front lines and area residents working in the supply chain. Last week he rolled out the city's Community Outreach Program, which will be used to run supplies and medications to homebound or vulnerable residents in the city limits through the use of window cards signaling if a resident is OK.

Courtney said volunteers had already hand-delivered a couple of thousand cards, which are also available for pickup if residents call the Outreach Team at 812-274-0777. The City of Madison Police department has also started picking up and delivering prescriptions for residents, as Courtney said they would last Friday.

"This is about keeping our community connected, staying in touch so that everyone, neighbor to neighbor, can do what we can to help out the community," Courtney said.

Jefferson County Commission President David Bramer said the county is implementing a similar program with signs on red and green construction paper for homebound residents and will post information on its Facebook page and website. Bramer said the cards are available at the courthouse for pickup and those wanting to pick them up can contact Sarah Morgan at 812-265-8944.

"We're just going to use red and green construction paper, so red means you need help and green means you're OK," Bramer said.

As for law enforcement, Madison Police Chief John Wallace did not report but Jefferson County Sheriff Dave Thomas said his agency continues to follow the lead of Indiana State Police on coronavirus-related issues. While no travel ban has been instituted at the local or state level, Thomas said the sheriff's office would soon be patrolling to look for non-essential businesses who had remained open against the governor's orders. Citizens are asked to continue staying home unless for essential reasons, he reminded.

Caretaking from the heart

ANNIE LANE
DEAR ANNIE

Dear Annie: I have never written to an advice columnist but feel the need to share my experience of having been the caregiver for my parents. It was so hard for me emotionally to visit as they slowly lost their memory and physical abilities. I frequently broke into tears when I left.

About two years before their passing, I had a conversation with a former nurse of the nursing home. We got to talking about people in the nursing home. She said, "When you bring your parents to us, we have no memories of them. We are here to care for them — food, bathing, a roof over their heads and general well-being — as best as we can. We then start to grow to love them for who they are today."

As I was driving home that night, it struck me: They are not my parents anymore. So, I tucked my memories of them in a back corner of my mind. I then thought, "What do they need at this point in their lives?"

My father, who was not much of a talker, especially since he had hearing issues, needed his cigarettes, a bit of conversation and watered-down whiskey. My mother needed conversation and chocolates. I would go up after work every other night with this agenda in mind.

I miss my parents, but I do not miss the toll it took on me for the last two and a half years of their lives. I also took the guilt I felt after their passing and turned it around into feelings of joy that they do not have to endure that part of their lives anymore.

It is wonderful that my memories of my parents come back in very unique ways, such as a smell or a phrase. Other times memories simply pop into my head. It brings a smile and maybe even a chuckle.

I have shared this story with my friends who are going through this with their parents. After I tell them about my experience, they say, "Wow, this sheds new light on how to think about my parents and what is needed for them." — A Former Caregiver

Dear Former Caregiver: Thank you for sharing your beautiful and well-narrated story about your parents. It sounds like they were wonderful people and, fittingly, that they raised a thoughtful and caring child.

Dear Annie: I read your response to Suds to My Elbows about everyone doing their share of cleanup during holiday celebrations, and I feel the exact opposite. I'd rather do the cleanup myself. My husband helps, but that is all the help I need.

I want to clear my own table, dishes and serving bowls. I fill the dishwasher and organize the other dirty dishes to be done later. My husband takes care of the leftovers. That takes care of that!

I get annoyed when people insist they help. When I say, "No, thank you," I mean, "NO, thank you!" I just want them to sit back and enjoy themselves. — I'd Rather Do It Myself

Dear I'd Rather Do It Myself: Wanting to do the cleanup yourself, or just with your husband, is understandable and, presumably, nice for the guests. Just make sure you are gracious while declining people's offer to help; it is their act of gratitude for your having hosted or served them a meal.

Fulfilling family financially is emotionally draining

ANNIE LANE
DEAR ANNIE

Dear Annie: I need assistance with family-related issues. I'm in my 50s, I have several siblings, my mother died several years ago, and I financially support my father. His only income is Social Security.

In my immediate family, I am the only one to have had a career where I was financially stable and secure. My brothers/sisters all worked off and on, most of their lives; however, they all relied on our parents for financial and material support. They and their children/grandchildren all received this support; I received none, nor did I request or need any. My parents were givers, to their detriment, as they never acquired any financial stability or possessions for their future. No home, no retirement, no investments.

I had always told them that I would help take care of them if something happened to either one of them, if they needed me. A part of me always knew one of them would.

I take care of my father financially (emotionally, too) by paying his rent, some utilities and car insurance and any needs that arise. I have been doing this for years now. Herein lies my emotional turmoil: I have siblings that have come to live with my father, out of their own needs. They help a little around the house and provide some assistance but I continue to pay the bills. I feel like I am now providing them with support and they are living off of me as well. My father continues to help children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren whenever he can or if they ask. I feel I am enabling the same financially reckless behavior that I felt he/they always had lived by.

I never received or asked for anything from my parents during my adult life. Now, after enduring my own life-changing event, the only one not to benefit from their generosity is the one left holding the bag. I've rebuilt my life again, with the emotional support of others.

Am I wrong to feel taken advantage of? I feel like I worked my whole life to now pay for others' lack of doing so. Am I obligated to my promise to my father (my life was different then)? I feel torn emotionally, not just financially. I love my father and my siblings, and I do not know how to stop this cycle without emotionally hurting them or crushing myself. Is it wrong that I feel resentful? I worked and saved, nobody else did; now, because I did, I'm the only one paying. — Emotionally Torn

Dear Emotionally Torn: Resentment is not "wrong," per se, but it is toxic — a thing to purge, rather than cling to. One simple way to lessen some of the resentment you're feeling is to remember your free will in the situation: Your choice to financially support your father (and, by extension, your siblings) is just that — a choice, not an obligation.

Bankrolling the bunch is taking a heavy toll on you in more ways than one. It's not just OK but necessary to revisit the arrangement and set some terms. One of those terms might be that your siblings contribute toward rent for as long as they're living there. They are all adults: If your stream of cash dries up, they can figure out how else to fill their pails.

Cheatham retires after 46-year career

730 career wins most among girls basketball coaches in Indiana

BY DAVID CAMPBELL

Donna Cheatham, the winningest girls basketball coach in Indiana high school history, has announced her retirement after an impressive 46-year career.

Cheatham, who originally hails from Jefferson County, won 730 games and lost only 274 in a career that began before girls basketball was an officially recognized sport by the IHSAA. While she spent most of her career at Scottsburg, a large chunk of her success came while coaching at Southwestern High School from 1997 to 2009.

"In the famous words of Barney Stinson, Coach will always be Legen... wait for it.... dary!!! Congrats on an amazing career!" said Madison girls basketball coach Sonja Bowyer, who played for Cheatham at Southwestern, on Facebook. "It was an honor to have played for Coach and an even bigger honor to have coached against her. Enjoy retirement!!"

Cheatham graduated from Dupont High School in 1963 and headed to Georgetown College in Kentucky. Although Dupont didn't offer girls sports at the time, Georgetown did and Cheatham starred in basketball, volleyball and softball for the college.

After graduating from Georgetown in 1967 with a degree in biology, Cheatham got her first teaching job at Scottsburg High School. Four years later, Cheatham and Jeanie Phillips started the Warriorettes girls basketball program.

Girls basketball wasn't recognized as an official sport by the IHSAA until 1975 and Cheatham estimates her team won nearly 200 games in the years prior to that designation. The moment the sport earned recognition by the IHSAA, Scottsburg became an instant state powerhouse, reaching the regional final in the first year.

From 1975 through 1997, Cheatham's Warriorette teams went 379-80 and reached the state finals three times, winning the championship in 1989 and finishing runner-up in 1986. Her 1989 squad is largely considered to be one of the best in state history, going 26-1, boasting Miss Basketball Renee Westmoreland and finishing 13th in USA Today's national high school rankings.

She left Scottsburg in 1997 after a dispute with school officials and ended up back in her home county, at Southwestern High School. It didn't take her long to turn the long-suffering program into a powerhouse. The Rebels reached their first-ever sectional championship game in 2000 and won their first sectional title in 2001 before exploding the following season.

The 2002 Southwestern Lady Rebels were a force to be reckoned with, going 26-2 and breezing to the Class 2A State Championship. The Rebels' two losses that year — to New Albany and Jeffersonville — came by a combined three points and Southwestern did not trail for the final 10 quarters of the state tournament. In the state championship game against Shenandoah at Banker's Life Fieldhouse in Indianapolis, the Rebels jumped out to a 10-0 lead and never looked back.

Despite the graduation of Indiana All-Star Brianna Howard and an early-season injury to starting center Julie Brawner, the Rebels returned to the state championship game again the following year — once again facing Shenandoah — and nearly pulled off a second-straight title. Catherine Graham's four-point play with 10 seconds to go gave Southwestern a one-point lead, but Shenandoah's Amanda Norris hit two free throws with two seconds left to give the Raiders the win.

Cheatham won four more sectional titles at Southwestern from 2005 through 2008 but the Rebels were stopped in the regional each time — the first by Shenandoah and the final three by Heritage Christian. All four of those teams that ousted Southwestern went on to win the state championship that season. Cheatham coached one more year at Southwestern before returning to Scottsburg after going 125-67 at the Hanover school. She won her 21st sectional title — and 14th at Scottsburg — in her third year back with the Warriorettes in 2012 but lost in the sectional championship game two other times. She won her 700th game in 2018 and was honored at an Indiana Pacers game last season.

Cheatham's 730 career wins are 56 more than the next-most by a girls coach in the state's history and her .727 winning percentage is one of the best in the state's history. She has won more than 30 coach of the year awards and sent more than 70 players to the college ranks. She was inducted into the Indiana Basketball Hall of Fame in 2003.

Despite all of her success, Cheatham has always remained humble and has always given credit for the wins to her players, assistant coaches and God.

"If I've won, it's because I was blessed," Cheatham told the Courier-Journal in 2018. "If God doesn't open the door, I'm going nowhere. I can't open the door. But it's my responsibility — once he opens it — to walk through. ... In my life, he has just blessed me. I don't know why."

Cheatham's retirement means that both basketball coaching jobs at Scottsburg are now open. The school fired boys coach Brent Jameson last month.

Adler earns NAIA All-American honors

BY DAVID CAMPBELL

Brady Adler's hopes of winning a bowling national championship were dashed thanks to the COVID-19 pandemic, but the former Madison Consolidated High School standout ended his final collegiate season with a nice consolation prize: NAIA All-American status.

Adler earned the honor after an outstanding junior season at Martin Methodist College in Tennessee. He and teammate Don Magennis are the first bowling All-Americans in the school's history. Coach Bob Learn Jr. also earned national Coach of the Year honors.

"This year was definitely my best year and I've definitely improved from past years and that's probably from my experience," Adler said Tuesday from his home in Madison. "I think in the past years I felt pressure to bowl well because I had the pressure that I was one of the best on the team and if I didn't bowl well, I was one of the reasons why we didn't do well. But this year I took the pressure off of myself, had an open mind, took it one shot at a time and whatever happened, happened. It seemed to work out pretty well."

Martin Methodist went 67-3 this season and was ranked as high as fifth in the nation at one point. The RedHawks won the Mid-South Conference regular season conference title and in their final meet of the season, they placed second in the MSC Tournament with 9,446 pins. Martin Methodist's Keith Davis won the individual title with 1,346 pins, with Adler placing a close second with 1,344.

The RedHawks' next tournament was scheduled to be the sectional qualifier on March 15 with the NAIA National Championships set to begin March 28. But both of those events were canceled by the NAIA due to the pandemic, ending Martin Methodist's hopes at a title.

Adler was actually at the airport in Louisville with current college and former high school teammate Kollier Pavy, just minutes from boarding the plane for the sectional tournament, when they received word of the cancellation. He said he was disappointed, but understood why the decision was made.

"We were pretty distraught by that. It was definitely a big shock. I didn't expect them to cancel it; I expected them to postpone it to a later date," Adler said. "But after seeing how the virus has spread, I definitely understand why they did what they did. But it's very disappointing."

Although Adler is just a junior, he will actually graduate this year with a bachelor's degree in accounting. Graduation ceremonies have been canceled but the school is looking into alternative ceremonies, including possibly moving the event to Aug. 8, a plan that Adler endorses since it will be the day before his birthday.

Adler said that he has some post-graduation jobs lined up but he's really interested in pursuing a professional career in bowling. He hopes to get back on the lanes this summer when the stay-at-home orders are lifted and has already looked into PBA qualifying tournaments in the fall.

"For the bigger tournaments, you have to qualify for them, but for some of the smaller events, I don't even think you need a PBA card. Some pros bowl in them, but it's mostly just amateurs," Adler said. "Once you get comfortable with that, you have to buy a PBA card and then you can travel to all of the tour stops."

Adler will finish up his final school year at Martin Methodist remotely and will tackle the future over the summer. But he can't help but think about what could have been.

"It just doesn't seem fair. I believe everything happens for a reason but I just wish we could have this one back," Adler said. "I feel like we were so prepared to prove that we were one of the best teams in the nation. This was our time to prove that we belong."
